Manufactured in Denmark in 1967, as evidenced by its original stamp under the seat, it belongs to that generation of furniture whose lines have stood the test of time without losing any of their modernity.? Its sculptural silhouette rests on a subtle balance between organic curves and structural simplicity. Crafted from molded plywood, its shell forms a generously curved seat that flows seamlessly into a distinctive T-shaped backrest. Four slender legs made of black tubular steel support this airy design, creating an elegant contrast with the wood's enveloping curves. A creation of apparent simplicity, behind which lies all of Arne Jacobsen's genius.? Over the course of its lifetime, this chair has taken on a new look, in a warm shade of caramel brown with hints of terracotta and light tobacco. This original finish, applied after the chair was manufactured, has gradually been enriched by the marks of everyday life. A few chips reveal earlier layers, while fine scratches, slight wear, and variations in sheen create a lively, almost painterly surface. Far from hiding its history, this patina gives it a unique identity, as if time had continued the designer's work in its own way.? Its warm color and black base lend it a personality that is both gentle and assertive. It will complement a vintage dining table just as well as an antique or contemporary desk, and will naturally find its place in an interior that blends Scandinavian design, industrial furniture, and vintage finds. Its charm lies precisely in this intersection of an iconic silhouette and a personal history, etched into the material.? Vintage condition with a beautiful patina from use. The chair has been repainted at some point and therefore no longer has its original finish. A few chips of paint, scratches, scuffs, and signs of age are visible, particularly along the edges of the seat, the edges of the backrest, and the black metal base. These imperfections bear witness to its history and fully contribute to its authentic character.?
