Description

An elegant and original Charles X-era inkwell (circa 1820-1830), made of bronze with an antique patina, featuring a particularly decorative design inspired by ancient oil lamps.Resting on a fluted pedestal with a rectangular base, this inkwell takes the form of an antique lamp, whose oval body is adorned with various compartments for writing accessories.One end is adorned with a superb handle depicting a winged dragon, with a curved neck, outstretched wings, and a coiled tail. The delicacy of its modeling and the fantastical nature of this creature reflect the Neo-Gothic taste that emerged during the Restoration.This combination of classical forms inherited from antiquity and medieval imagination is particularly representative of the decorative trends of the Charles X era.The piece as a whole features a
