Description

An antique oak refectory table from Belgium, made around 1850. Long tables like this one were made for the dining halls of monasteries, farms and large households, where the whole company sat together at one simple, sturdy table.The rectangular top is made of thick oak planks with a moulded edge, resting on two trestle ends. Each end has a pair of turned baluster legs standing on a broad shoe foot, and the two ends are joined by a long stretcher low above the floor. The turned legs and the shaped shoe feet give the table a strong, sculptural presence from every side.The table is made of solid oak with a deep, dark brown patina built up over many years of use. The construction is pegged and simple, typical of the Flemish country furniture of the time, and the wide planks show a beautiful grain.A wonderful
