Description

Welcome to La Trésorerie!This late-Medieval pitcher, made in Siegburg, features a finely fluted cylindrical neck, an ovoid body, and a wide ribbon-like handle connecting the neck to the shoulder. Light ochre-beige in color, it rests on a wavy, hand-pinched foot. The wheel marks on the body and the irregular undulations of the foot bear witness to the potter's shaping of the piece.Siegburg was one of the earliest centers of production for Rhenish stoneware.
High-temperature firing made the ceramic hard and virtually impermeable, making it particularly well-suited for the production of pitchers and jugs, which were exported primarily to England in the late Middle Ages. In the 16th century, Siegburg became known for its Schnellen, tall, slender mugs often adorned with relief decorations. Another iconic form of Rhenish stoneware, the "bellarmine", most commonly associated with Cologne and Frechen, is recognizable by the bearded man's face adorning its neck. This simple jug from Siegburg dates from a period prior to the emergence of these more richly decorated forms.The pitcher has not been restored. A few fine firing cracks, which appeared during its manufacture, are visible.Height: 22.5 cmBelly diameter: approximately 12.5 cmWeight: 949 gThank you for visiting La Trésorerie.Best regards,Ben
