Description

Knife known as a KrissJava Island, Indonesia19th centuryWood, pamor, brass, silverTotal length: 39; Blade length: 29.5 cmHandle, called ukiran, made of wood carved with floral and foliage motifs. Brass guard.Double-edged, wavy pamor blade.Wooden scabbard covered with brass and silver-plated brass, decorated with zoomorphic figures and floral and foliage motifs.The kris is a distinctly masculine weapon. A marker of social status and wealth, it was also the object symbolically presented to a young boy upon his coming of age.The more intricately crafted the blade and the more noble the materials used for the handle, the higher the owner's rank.The ukiran, almost always carved in an anthropomorphic style, is considered an allegory of its owner. Thus, the head represents the hilt, the body the blade, and the clothing the sheath. It is worth noting that the traditional garment of Balinese men is the sarong--the same name given to the sheath of the kriss.The kriss, endowed with magical powers, is considered a vehicle of spirituality. It is passed down through inheritance, which allows its power to grow.Ref.: 222Text and photos © FCP CORIDON
