Ricardo Santamaría - Biography

born 1920 in Zaragoza-Aragón (Spain) / died 2013 in Southern France.

1940s: studies at the "Escuela de Artes y Oficios" in Zaragoza -

Santamaría proves his versatile skills as a conservator-restorer (e.g. of Gothic mosaics), gilder and sculptor.

In the 1960s the artist is determined to shake up the rigid society of the post-war years (Manifiesto de Riglos).

He is also a founding member of the "Grupo Zaragoza".

In his work as an artist Ricardo Santamaría passes through Figurative, Realist, Late Impressionist and Neocubist stages before settling on Abstract Art.

Following an extended confrontation with the Francoist regime, during which he even received anonymous threats at his home address, Santamaría decides that he can no longer tolerate the Spanish government's massive control of the national art scene and moves to France in the late 1960s.

He plays a key role in the founding of the "Grupo Zaragoza" in the 1960s, an interdisciplinary art movement that also integrates theatre, music, cinematography, etc. In accordance with this spirit, Santamaría works not only as a sculptor but also creates so-called "esculto-pinturas", which strive to combine the art forms of sculpting and painting. The artist also experiments with different materials.

This approach is revolutionary for the time and is therefore naturally regarded as politically suspicious in Fascist Spain.

The following four concepts are of central significance for Santamaría's artistic oeuvre:

1. freedom as an essential prerequisite for any form of creativity
2. experimental art forms
3. transcendence
4. ethical responsibility

Spirituality is also a crucial aspect of his way of thinking. The artist is strongly influenced by the spiritual "Mudéjar" culture, which is based on authentic abstraction (to him, arabesque art transcends mere decoration and represents pure abstraction with a profound aesthetic and metaphysical dimension - cf. the Aljaferia Palace in Zaragoza).

Works by artists such as Paul Klee and Henri Matisse, incidentally, reveal a significant "arabesque influence" as well.

Santamaría believes that in order to play an active role, art needs to merge opposites:

caos-orden; unitario-disperso;

racional-instintivo;

constructivismo-destructivismo, etc.

Furthermore, he is convinced that dogmatic views inevitably lead to stagnation and sclerosis (which is also why he never associates with political parties, unlike many artists at the time). Perhaps Santamaría's ideals are best described as "timeless spirituality" (espiritualidad intemporal). His works are characterised by uncompromising authenticity that defies any imitation.

Some of his exhibitions:

1997: Museo Pablo Gargallo (Zaragoza)

2004: Exceptional retrospective at the Palacio de Sástago (Zaragoza)

His original sculptures, which convey a certain "Belleza de lo Humilde", are especially remarkable.

The artist typically combines stark contrasts: construction-destruction; arabesque-restrained; polychrome-monochrome; rhythm-tension. Santamaría's works often represent an interplay of "humildad" (humility, restrained simplicity) and "audacia inventiva" (inventive audacity, experimental conceptualisation).
