Description

In the autumn of 1817 Eastlake went to Tivoli and stayed for six weeks close to the Temple of Vesta, from where he wrote to his mother: "Here one loiters about in the evening, and hence you look down an unfathomable gulf into; which two cascades tumble". He felt inspired there, as many others were: "How rich in associations is Tivoli", wrote Samuel Rogers in his journal (1815), "Horace and Catullus, Claude and Poussin have given it a lustre not its own, and yet it is a gem of the first order". Eastlake painted thirty oil studies whilst at Tivoli, and went back to Rome persuaded that he had learned "a little more landscape".
