He was a member of the Munich Secession. In this statement of principles, the artists declared their intentions to move away from outmoded principles and a conservative conception of what art was.
Throughout the 1930s, many political ideologies (Marxism, Socialism, Capitalist Democracy, Communism and Fascism) were engaged in struggles for dominance, and epitomised the political atmosphere of the era.
Surrealism art continued to be prevail in Europe, and had grown to have influence worldwide. Artists began to focus on the idea of humility and of the ordinary man on the streets.
Vukmanovic was honored with prizes and had numerous solo exhibitions and participations in exhibitions, showing ordinary street scenes with people a fairy tale-like colours and shape.
The painter died in 1995, in Degernau, Germany.
