the year of his first participation in the Paris Salon that he created his own foundry workshop which he personally managed until 1877. This was described as a meeting place for artists and writers, frequented among others by Alexandre Dumas. He deals himself with casting and carving to edit his own works to which will be added in a second time those of his son-in-law, Auguste Cain, He produces many animal sculptures, particularly in vogue under the Second Empire , as were those of Antoine-Louis Barye, Auguste Cain. Mêne specializes in small bronzes and does not produce works for public statuary. His animal subjects are a great popular success and are the subject of many editions. Exclusive publisher of his works, the perfection of his productions is recognized and he proves to be, with Barye, like the one whose success is the most constant, and this over the longest period. Mêne appears to be one of the best practitioners of his time and makes his models in wax. After the death of Pierre Jules-Mêne and that of Auguste Cain, the Susse foundry bought the reproduction rights to his work and continued to publish it.
