Amphora is a company founded in Turn-Teplitz (today in the Czech Republic) around 1892, which was originally called (RSt&K), named after the founders of the company: Riessner, Stellmacher and Kessel. Like many other pottery and porcelain factories in Turn-Teplitz in the early 20th century, it benefited from the kaolin resources quarried nearby. The main decorators of this period were Eduard Stellmacher, Paul Dachsel and graduates of the Special School for Ceramics and Glass in Teplitz, who created many of the beautiful Art Nouveau designs for which this pottery is still known today. The products varied from vases with women's faces in the style of Alphonse Mucha, vases with nymphs, products with images of animals to abstract and more modern organic decorations.
