Description

Reliquary guardian figure. Kota, Ndassa, Gabon or Democratic Republic of Congo Height: 51 cm - with base 53 cm (sold with base) Width: 24 cm Around 1950 - 1960 The Kota, as well as the Mahongwé, Ndassa, Shamaye, Obamba (who are under -ethnic groups) are famous for their reliquaries. Initially, the Kota used to leave their dead exposed to the elements, in the forest. Under the influence of neighboring tribes, they began to bury their chiefs, then to exhume their bones (mainly the skull) to place them in bark boxes or baskets called bwété, on which a statue was placed. Of these boxes or wicker baskets rarely complete, we know above all the sculptures which surmounted them, intended to warn of the forces of the invisible likely to lessen the supernatural power of the relics."Such reliquaries
