Description

Bird Vase with Double Spout and Bridge & Peru Nazca Culture 100 to 700 AD Vase with double spout and bridge in the shape of a drinking vessel which developed sometime before 500 BC. AD by indigenous groups of the Peruvian coast. True to its name, this type of bottle is distinguished by two spouts connected by a handle. First used by the Paracas culture it was then adopted by the Nazca. While at first the Paracas tended to incise designs derived from the art of the Chavin culture onto the surface of the vases, later they began to treat them as sculpted forms, an advance facilitated by developments ceramic technology which made it possible to construct containers with thinner walls. This tradition was continued by the Nazca, whose containers were minutely figurative, decorated with polychrome glazes, like
