"No one could doubt when reading Search for Purity in 1939, that he was a pacifist or warmonger, a supporter of force or non-violence, that he found himself in the presence of an extraordinary text [...]. And if there is a text on which Jean Giono and Bernard Buffet were likely to meet happily, it is certainly this one. [...] This book takes its place alongside the Songs of Maldoror because both speak of the same despair and the same disgust: that of man before man. Whether he is standing or on his knees, in front of the guns or free, whether he is blindfolded or not, the man is alone."

Some slight marks of use taken in photos.
