Description

- This tapestry represents a Flemish genre scene in the style of David Teniers II. We observe, at the edge of a forest, a couple of dancing villagers, alongside a man watching them smoking a pipe. Below this rustic scene, we observe an elegant baroque garden with orange trees, foliage beds, a pond decorated with a fountain, a portico... The color palette has retained freshness and vigor with highlights of red for the peasants' clothes and with all the shades of green and blue making it possible to accurately render the abundant vegetation in the foreground in which bursts of light have been introduced by touch, thanks to the use of golden yellow silk, at the ends leaves.

the weaving (up to 9 threads/cm) allowed an excellent textile translation with, in particular for the background, the rendering of the architectural and plant details of the garden; we can even see the fruits of the orange trees.

- David II Teniers (1610-1690) illustrates the great Flemish tradition of the genre scene. It depicts the occupations of simple people in Flanders during the first half of the 17th century. In tapestry, we can place the appearance of the "Ténières" towards the end of the 17th century. Teniers' paintings were distinguished by positive depictions of peasant life, which contrasted with older Dutch and Flemish artists who tended to depict peasants with a satirical tone. While many "Teniers" tapestries include comic elements, the men and women are presented as fundamentally honest and rustic. It is this simple, almost Arcadian vision of rural life which constitutes the key to the success of the "Teniers" tapestries. Their immense popularity was one of the most striking trends in 18th-century European tapestry production. The genre was born in Brussels in the last decades of the 17th century, then tapestries were produced in other Flemish weaving centers (notably Antwerp and Oudenaarde) and also further afield in France (Lille, Aubusson) so that at the beginning From the 18th century, "Teniers" tapestries were exported throughout Europe.
