Jean-Baptiste Dutertre (1705-1773) is one of the most important Parisian horologists of the second third of the 18th century. He was the son of a clockmaker and he became a master in 1735. He took over the direction of his father's workshop in the Quai des Orfèvres and immediately became quite successful. Like the best artisans of his day, Dutertre called on the best bronzers for his gilt bronze clock cases, collaborating with Jean-Baptiste Osmond, and Jean-Joseph de Saint-Germain, in particular. Influential aristocrats of the time were his clients; among
