Chevanard...) and began to make a name for himself. However, the war changed his course. Hired as a volunteer, he decided to put his art at the service of the country and joined the 13th Artillery Regiment and the 1st Engineer, as a camouflage. In 1919, after the war, he did not return to Paris, but settled in Saint-Jean-de-Luz and created, with Lukas and Etienne Vilotte - two artists he knew in the trenches - the art pottery of Ciboure. He worked there for two years, decorating stoneware pottery and creating a new Basque art deco mixing forms and inspirations of ancient Greece with a modern Basque regionalism. In 1922, he moved alone in a workshop of the Pergola of Saint-Jean-de-Luz and devoted himself to the painting of the Basque Country, its landscapes, its customs and its inhabitants. On his death in 1936 in Saint-Jean-de-Luz, he left behind more than a thousand works, now scattered in private or public collections.
