Description

Ex-collection of Belgian African art.

The Hemba, who reside in southeastern Zaire on the right bank of the Lualaba, have long been under the influence of the neighboring Luba empire, which has had a significant impact on their culture, religion and art. At the heart of Hemba society is ancestor worship, although the sculptures associated with it were initially attributed to the Luba. Genealogy plays a central role in securing privileges and land distribution, imbuing all aspects of the community with the authority of ancestors. The latter are seen as having an influence on justice, medicine, law and sacrificial rituals. The singiti statues were under the care of the fumu mwalo, hereditary chief, and were honored during ceremonies during which
