And he looked just as his pupil molded him in clay and then cast him in bronze. An angular, wise, ironic little man, igobbed by the weight of years and misery. He had much influence on our Franceschino, especially on the way he related to the real world, to nature, to men. Like the Greeks, Sandrun tried to bring out their personalities from these figures; not only working on the face, but also on the body and the attitudes that life forces us to assume."
