Description

North America, New Mexico, Spanish Colonial Period, circa 1700 to 1780. A beautifully preserved example of a Spanish Colonial pétaca (travel suitcase), made of rawhide. It features limb bands that act as hinges and an iron lock at the front. The leather features a fantastic repeating geometric decoration of stars and flowers, in a style inspired by the Aztecs. Petacas like these were used throughout the Spanish Empire, with some regional stylistic variations. Dimensions: 62 cm x 40 cm x 29 cm Mary Caroline Montano writes in her book "Tradiciones Nuevomexicanas: Hispano Arts and Culture of New Mexico": "Some New Mexico chests were made with an overlay of leather, an influence from the Aztec Indians Mexicans, who called their leather chests "petacas" (derived from
