Known for his portraits in the vein of Nicolas de Largillierre, of whom he was a pupil around 1710, Jacques-François Delyen nevertheless chose more rigid atmospheres and poses than those of his master, sometimes approaching more Hyacinthe Rigaud. Much rarer than the works of his colleagues, his paintings are today in the picture rails of the Palace of Versailles (for his two portraits of Bertin and Coustou presented as reception pieces at the Academy), or even at the Museum of Fine Arts from Nîmes, or even in Orléans for a superb spring woman.

Our man and his almost scruffy outfit are reminiscent of 18th century artists and their poses where rigor is not welcome. There are many similarities with Delyen's work between the technique and the mechanics of the composition, without forgetting the treatment of the flesh and drapery.
