A country party was a popular form of entertainment in the 18th century.

Despite the pastoral or rustic connotations implied by the term country party, this particularly popular form of entertainment in the form of garden parties at the Court of Versailles, where the parts of the park intended for these festivities were laid out with follies, pavilions, and temples, often took the form of an extremely elegant entertainment where the guests, sometimes in costume, were entertained, on occasion, by orchestras hidden among the trees.
