360 EUR

Period : 20th century

Condition : Très bon état

Material : Silk

Length : manches : 130 cm - 51"

Height : 100 cm - 39,5"

Description

Silk Haori jacket with interior decoration of a countryside scene, horse and peasant, hand painted.
Dimensions: Sleeve length: 130 cm - height: 100 cm
Originally, the haori was an exclusively masculine garment, worn by powerful warriors who made it a sort of coat worn over their breastplates.
The colors and decorations visibly designated the clan to which they belonged.
When this jinbaori lost its military function, it transformed into a jacket with or without sleeves and whose shape evolved over time.
The haori does not cross in front but is closed with a himo (silk cord), leaving a space between the two sides.

The Showa era (????, Showa-jidai, lit. "era of enlightened peace") is the period in Japanese history when Emperor Showa (Hirohito) ruled the country. It began on December 25, 1926 and ended on January 7, 1989. It is also the Japanese era which follows the Taisho era and precedes the Heisei era. It was the longest reign of any Japanese emperor.
