The artwork, though unsigned, shows two sailboats with their sails unfurled. The colors are vivid, and the reflections on the water are captured with great skill, giving an impression of movement and light. Pastel shades and bright colors blend harmoniously to depict a sunny day at sea.

Lapchine's influences include Claude Monet and Camille Pissarro, famous for their use of light and landscapes. This painting reflects that style, highlighting the simple beauty of the sea and fishing boats. The brushstrokes are quick and the contours slightly blurred, typical of Impressionism, aiming to capture the moment rather than precise details.

In summary, this painting is a fine example of outdoor painting from that era, illustrating everyday life with sensitivity and brightness.
