Description

The game of boules is said to have been created in Gaul. The balls were first made of clay, stone, then wood and finally steel, but after the "bouleurs" of the Middle Ages, the golden age of boules of all kinds was certainly the Renaissance when the nobility took over the game in the same way as bilboquet and jeu de paume (which would become tennis). For obscure reasons, the game was banned for the people in 1629, a ban that was not followed up and quickly lifted. In the 18th century the game remained very popular, to the point that the Encyclopedia of Diderot and D'Alembert mentions it. The French Revolution, by abolishing the privileges of the nobility, once again legalized the practice of the game for all.
