origins. These ancient pieces originating from Anatolia in Turkey, were knotted in mountainous, harsh, austere and very poor regions. The staircase shape interprets the mountain, the stylized flowers are elements of happiness and peace. Many neophytes wonder how these rugs came to us in good condition, even in very good condition. Quite simply: ## These prayer rugs are regularly found in good condition because they have always been piously preserved in families or by owners/collectors who love this genre. It is and will be increasingly difficult to find original pieces of original quality, real artifacts, in fact either families keep them or collectors guard them jealously. This piece is in its discovery state, my passion for old Anatolians prevents me from inflicting a restoration on them. This rug is today more intended to be placed on a wall and to be admired like a painting than to be on the floor. Its vocation was not originally to be trampled underfoot. I think that any sensitive amateur understands this. This piece is in beautiful condition for its great age, and has been professionally and ecologically cleaned.

The world of carpets represents a vast and complex field that requires knowledge and seriousness. Knowing at least the origins, the names, and the manufacturing process seems obvious to me... It's a job that can't be improvised!!! (texts, photo credit Winstein, all rights reserved).
