makes light the essential element of his painting.
For him, it is the true subject of expression when he paints the poetry of a twilight.

"The vibrant note, such is indeed the goal that Nattero wants to achieve: to this, he is not afraid to sacrifice the precise line. »

At the age of 26, thanks to a scholarship from the city of Toulon, he attended the École nationale supérieure des Beaux-Arts in Paris for a few months, where he was a student of Léon Bonnat.

However, he suffered from lead poisoning and was reluctantly forced to stop his Parisian studies.

He then returned to Toulon, then settled permanently in Marseille, his hometown, in 1904.

His talent was quickly recognized and his paintings were very successful from 1905
onwards.

He took part in most of the Salons in the Marseille and Toulon region and worked hard to feed his large family.

In 1914, war broke out and three of his sons left for the front (Raphaël, Auguste and Edouard).

His paintings no longer sold. A deep despair overcame him.

In 1915 he took his own life.
