to the Salon in which he participated for the first time in 1847

Frequenting the Hôtel de Lauzun, he became friends with many painters, in particular Delacroix, Daubigny and Dechaume.

He was then a leader in the small circle of artists of the time. But closer to a conception of a rough and simple life than to the Parisian agitation, he retired to the countryside and went there to draw the portrait of the life of the peasants and fishermen of the time with the sincerity of a man deeply attached to the land and to the working classes.
