above the others. Houlagou Khan thus founded the Ilkhanate of Persia in Iran. In Ilkhanid art, we can see the use of earlier local techniques (such as metallic luster) with a significant Chinese contribution. These tribes, initially shamanists and Buddhists, ended up converting to Islam in 1290.

Takht-e Sulayman is a Zoroastrian site in northwestern Iran reused by the Mongols (a way of ensuring historical continuity and legitimizing their power). The iconography of the siliceous paste covering tiles with metallic luster decoration from Takht-e Sulayman is particular: it is linked to the pre-Islamic history of Iran, and is imbued with Chinese themes such as the dragon or the phoenix which are symbols of imperial power. The entire repertoire is linked to a desire for political legitimation: legitimation vis-à-vis the Chinese Great Khans and legitimation vis-à-vis the local populations. Our example can, for example, be stylistically compared to a tile preserved by the Victoria and Albert Museum (no. 1841-1876) representing Bahram Gur hunting, and discovered at Takht-e Sulayman.
