Ernest Lawson, an American impressionist painter, was a prominent member of the group of "Eight", an association of artists committed to opposing the academicism imposed by the National Academy of Design. This collective distinguished itself by its desire to promote a freer and more contemporary artistic vision. Mainly known for his landscapes, Lawson draws his inspiration from Alfred Sisley, master of impressionism, as well as from the American John Henry Twachtman. His style is characterized by a thick and energetic touch, accompanied by chalky tones that give his works a vibrant and unique texture. In the last years of his life, Lawson settled in Florida, near Miami, a place that nourished his imagination and influenced his artistic production. He painted many bright beach scenes as well as immersive views of the mangroves, demonstrating his attachment to nature and tropical landscapes.
