period. The Daunians, an ancient people of Apulia, were distinguished by their refined ceramics decorated with geometric and figurative motifs. This kyathos, used to draw and pour liquids, reflects their artistic skill and symbolic iconography, with its concentric motifs and stylized birds. The Daunians valued their utilitarian objects to the point of developing sophisticated restoration techniques. The holes drilled for attaching staples testify to the particular care taken to prolong the life of damaged pieces, a common practice in antiquity. This kyathos is distinguished by the rarity and beauty of its central motif representing two stylized birds. In Daunian art, birds often symbolize concepts such as freedom, spirituality, or the connection between the earthly world and the divine. Their representation on utilitarian objects such as this kyathos suggests a ritual or symbolic dimension, reflecting the importance of these themes in Daunian culture. This work is a precious testimony to the art and cultural traditions of Magna Graecia.
