Some of them show, from the 1870s, his interest in Asian art, as evidenced by the Composition with ginger pot dated 1876, sold in Paris on June 26, 2024 (sold for EUR18,000). This taste culminated at the Universal Exhibition in Paris in 1878, where the painter was fascinated by the extraordinary richness of the Japanese pavilion, considered one of the most spectacular.

This display of works of art and testimonies of Japanese civilization would inspire the superb portraits of actors by Manzaï made in large format, as well as a certain number of still lifes with Japanese or Chinese objects. Among them, the Still Life with Chinese Vase, dated 1890, is a very fine example. It shows the great pictorial quality of this series with its elaborate layout and sought-after color work: the deep red vase, placed in close-up in the center of the composition, is presented as a work of art, alone, magnified by the imposing drapery in the background, in a complementary blue-green. The painting shows Mniszech's love for Far Eastern objects and his desire to showcase them through theatrical presentation and meticulous, refined technique.
