Description

This oil on canvas can be dated between 1810 and 1820. Several elements allow us to situate it in this historical context. The young man's hairstyle, short and combed high, is typical of this period marked by neo-classical influences, breaking with the powdered wigs of the 18th century. His costume, consisting of a dark jacket, a high collar and a carefully tied white tie, reflects the elegant men's fashion of the post-revolutionary years and the Empire. This sober and refined style was particularly popular with the bourgeoisie and the wealthy classes. Finally, the treatment of the face, highlighting the features and expression of the model, underlines the importance given to individual representation and social status at this time. This portrait thus testifies to the taste for refinement and elegance of the years 1810-1820.
