the end of the 16th century. These repertae are highlighted and "situated" by Stradan in a lively and dramatic manner, according to the advice given by humanist pedagogues such as Erasmus and of which Jean-Claude Margolin gives an analysis in his: "About Stradan's Nova reperta" in "Esthétiques de la nouveauté à la Renaissance", Franck Lessay and François Laroque (dir.), Presses Sorbonne Nouvelle Collection, Paris, 2001

"Here is an open-air scene, more precisely a street scene, where we see two riders: one (on the left), in front of a shop, is mounted on his horse (is he going to get off, or has he got back on?), the other (on the right) is preparing to get back on, his left foot already engaged in the stirrup (scala), seeming to take leave of a shopkeeper who is standing near him. He has apparently procured some practical object, or rather some essential ointment. What is it? The title indicates it, as will be indicated with more precision by the Latin legend of the subscription. But these Latin or Latin-Greek terms, unknown to Cicero or Caesar, are not immediately assimilable, even if the radical sto-48 from which they are formed gives an idea of stability, firmness or aplomb (in this case, of the feet). They actually mean herbs called pedicular⁴⁹ which are also called philopodes, that is to say herbs which relieve the feet of these riders, shod in narrow and uncomfortable boots, and enduring long hours or long days on horseback, without being able to rest them in the open air. This is how the author of the Latin caption describes and interprets the image: Pedes, humi ut, stetero equo, insidentium, cito levati, ut ipsa scala sublevat ("Having dismounted, the riders, as soon as they are remounted, are quickly relieved, the stirrup itself delivering them from their suffering").
