Alfréd Justitz was a Czech painter, graphic artist, illustrator and representative of the founding generation of modern Czech painting.

He had his first contact with painting in Jihlava, where he met the painter Roman Havelka and was enchanted by his work. He began his artistic journey by studying architecture at the Czech Technical University in Prague with Professor Jan Kotera, and then transferred to the Prague Academy with Professors Pirner and Thiel.

He improved his painting skills in Karlsruhe, Germany, with Professor Ludwig Schmid-Reutte and in Berlin with Wilhelm Trübner. In 1910 he went to Paris, where he was enchanted by the works of Cézanne, Derain, Daumier and other great names.

In 1928 he joined the SVU Mánes[2], and exhibited with the Tvrdosíjný group. He was also a prominent graphic artist and illustrator. His illustrations adorn, for example, the novel Notre Dame de Paris by V. Hugo, published in 1927. Many galleries also preserve his poster work. Justitz was also an active Freemason, a member of the Sibi et Posteris lodge in Prague. The tombstone in the Nová Cerekva cemetery was dedicated to his lodge and bears Masonic symbolism.
