went into partnership and opened a foundry in 1838. Barbedienne, very interested in the innovative techniques favored by the government of Louis-Philippe, actively participated in the Romantic movement. The taste for history and Gallo-Roman archaeology spread at the same time as that for antique bronzes. Achille Collas had also invented a mechanical process that made it possible to mathematically reproduce, by means of a reducer, or pantograph, sculptures in the round. This invention was considered from the start to be as important as that of the daguerreotype. The firm of Collas and Barbedienne marketed plaster reductions of the Venus de Milo for a while, then specialized in the production of bronzes based on the antique. At the international exhibition in London in 1851, then at that in Paris in 1855, the firm, registered under the name of Barbedienne, won numerous medals.
