Otakar Lebeda was a Czech painter, along with Antonín Slavíček and Frantisek Kaván, the most important Czech landscape painter and a student of Julius Marák.

At first, his paintings were strongly influenced by realism, by the Czech painter Antonín Chitussi, who died shortly before Lebed's career began, and also by the French landscape painter Camille Corot. In 1898, he took advantage of a scholarship to visit Paris and Barbizon. During this period of his painting, under the influence of, among others, his older colleague Slavíček, he showed a strong impressionist influence. In the last phase of his career, he began to concentrate on figurative painting, especially in his last work, Killed by Lightning, a large-scale canvas that he never finished and in which elements of later expressionism can be recognized. From June 26, 2009 to January 24, 2010, the artist's major retrospective exhibition was held at the Wallenstein Riding School of the National Gallery in Prague. The exhibition was curated by Veronika Hulíková, and the architectural design was by Vladimír Hora. A representative catalogue was published on the occasion of the exhibition.
