ventilation of homes were limited, potpourris made it possible to mask bad odors in living rooms, bedrooms and reception rooms. They were particularly used in private mansions, castles and boudoirs, where they diffused a delicate and natural perfume. Made of porcelain, earthenware or precious metal, potpourris were often luxury items, produced by manufacturers prestigious. Their refined decoration, often openwork to allow the diffusion of perfume, made them decorative pieces prized in aristocratic interiors. Some potpourri mixtures were designed with plants with medicinal properties, supposed to purify the air and prevent illness. In particular, cloves, lavender, rosemary and citrus fruits were found, known for their antiseptic properties.
