Description

Rare Chelsea Porcelain Figurine of Diana the Huntress, Gold Anchor Period, c. 1760

An exceptionally rare Chelsea porcelain figurine of "Diana the Huntress", dating to around 1760, during the Gold Anchor period of the Chelsea manufactory. The gold anchor mark is visible on the back. This finely modelled figurine depicts Diana, the Roman goddess of the hunt, seated on a rock with her bow in hand, accompanied by a hound. The figurine showcases delicate hand-painted details, including Diana's gold-trimmed headpiece and carefully rendered facial features, demonstrating the exceptional craftsmanship of Chelsea porcelain masters. The base is ornately decorated with gilded scrollwork, a hallmark of Chelsea's luxurious Rococo designs. Historical BackgroundThe Chelsea porcelain factory was one of the most important English porcelain manufacturers of the 18th century, renowned for its high-quality soft-paste porcelain and exquisite Rococo decorations. Chelsea figurines from this period were highly prized among the English aristocracy, often used as table decorations or cabinet pieces. The Gold Anchor period (c. 1756-1769) represents one of the factory's final phases before its merger with Derby, making pieces from this time especially sought after by collectors due to their refinement and detailed execution. Chelsea's influence on English porcelain was profound, setting a standard for artistry that inspired later manufacturers. Today, Chelsea porcelain remains a symbol of 18th-century elegance, with pieces treasured in museums and private collections worldwide.
