Description

Bench. Walnut. Spanish School, 17th century. Bench made of walnut wood carved in its color, with a backrest composed of a smooth rectangular board and a seat composed of another board similar to the previous one, both arranged at an angle. The legs have a particular shape, called "lyre", and are decorated with plant and architectural motifs (foliage) in relief. It also has two wooden "ties", whose profile is wavy. The tables with lyre-shaped legs have their origins in the Spain of Charles II, during the second half of the 17th century. The simplest tables have a simple cutout in the side legs, and are even entirely carved in models with a peripheral center. This support element, as can be seen, was also used in other types of furniture. The material is also common in old Spanish cabinetmaking,
