In the 19th century, palampores were highly prized in Europe for their quality and exotic designs. They were often used as bedspreads, curtains, or even as decorative wall hangings. The designs could vary considerably, from floral motifs to more elaborate scenes, often inspired by nature or traditional Indian motifs. Palampores were usually made by hand, with elaborate dyeing and painting techniques, making them unique and highly valued. The importation of these textiles had a significant impact on interior design in Europe and contributed to the popularity of oriental motifs in Victorian interior design.ref 120924
