Description

This antique modeling in clay or plaster is from the Atelier Michel Caryl, the whole thing is decorative. This is a beautifully crafted neoclassical decoration. A female figure wearing a belted chiton under the chest, revealing her right breast. The position of the feet, the twisting of the upper body, and the clothing revealing her anatomy allow this figure to be interpreted as a dancing maenad. The statuette is inspired by a famous work by Lysippos, in bronze, created around 320 BC, representing the poetess Praxilla, from Sicyon, dancing and playing the flute to accompany her Bacchic songs. It may be the same statue described by Pliny, Natural History, XXXIV, under the name of the "temulenta tibicina," the drunken aulos player. We note some wear and cracks, however the
