Fujisawa Art Museum "Thoughts for the Earth Hidden in Bronze." His years of war and captivity influenced his art. He created numerous representations of captives. His detention on the shores of the Caspian Sea allowed him to come into contact with German prisoners of war, whose portraits he left behind. The result is a strange style. The portraits have exaggerated features; the full-length figures, on the other hand, no longer have faces. Anecdotes evoke his secluded life in the mountains near Omiya. His studio, resembling a mountain cabin, was a sort of cabinet of curiosities, filled like a warehouse.
