Description

Georges Chaudoir, with the active help of his wife Suzanne Perot, is considered the renovator of the art of tapestry, once so developed in Brussels, but he is also, alas, the last representative of this activity which made Brussels famous for many centuries. In 1910, he took over the workshop of Arthur Lambrechts, founded in 1878, almost a hundred years after the closure of the workshop of Jacques Van der Borch, the last representative of the ancient tradition. After his death, Suzanne Perot, with the help of one of her daughters, Georgette Lambin-Chaudoir, and her grandson, Michel Borin, a decorator who graduated from the Etterbeek School of Art and Crafts, continued this business until Suzanne Perot's death. This is how the last Brussels factory ended, the only one with
