interned and never fully recovered from his mental illness. He exhibited in Paris in 1960. He painted typical landscapes of the Butte de Montmartre, Le Lapin à Gill, Moulin de La Galette, and Maison de Mimi Pinson before Utrillo took them as his themes. After the First World War, his views of Paris brought him great success. Around 1920, a wealthy art lover gave him the means for a long stay in the south of France, from where he brought back landscapes whose wonder at the Mediterranean nature they conveyed sometimes brought to mind the name of Matisse.violondingres.fr
