Roger-Marx, who does not fail to note "the atmosphere of disguise which is dear to him" as well as "the muted truculence which he gives to the opaque backgrounds where cold grays, greens, carmines and saffrons sing with distinction"[8] when in 1951 the prize of the Society of Art Collectors and Amateurs was awarded to Gabriel Dauchot. Waldemar George observed in the 1950s that if "his early works were treated in a realistic style which sometimes borders on populism, the painter tries to free himself from it and reacts against a literary art". His last paintings of then, "portraits, landscapes, compositions and still lifes, are imposed by the intense life of the material"[9]. Nearly forty years later, however, in 1989, Gérald Schurr continued to retain in Dauchot's work "a sad countryside populated by pitiful beings, halfway between drama and derision, a colorful universe saved from tragedy by a scathing humor." His apartment-studio was located at no. 5 Place Pigalle in Paris.
