Description

Louis XV style desk. Gilt bronze, stone. Possibly French school, 19th century. Gilt bronze desk with a metal plate in the lower part and a decoration based on plant and architectural elements in the upper part, with a certain classical influence, but whose composition and combination of movements are somewhat reminiscent of the Rococo. Resting on scroll-shaped legs, it has two inkwells with hinged lids and a central area revealing a heart-shaped veined stone plate (possibly marble), surrounded by plant and architectural elements. The existence of another very similar example is attested in a French private collection, which is common in this type of work due to the high specialization of bronze workshops in France, which created a series of identical or very
