History of ruby and diamond rings Throughout the centuries, the combination of rubies and diamonds has been a symbol of luxury, power, and passion. Rubies, long considered "the stone of the sun," have been revered for their fiery red color, often associated with love, vitality, and nobility. Civilizations such as the Hindu and Persian regarded rubies as sacred stones believed to protect the wearer and attract good fortune. In contrast, the diamond is the ultimate symbol of eternity and purity, representing strength and resilience. Valued as a gemstone for over 3,000 years, diamonds were highly prized by Indian royalty and nobility. In Europe, diamond jewelry became refined from the 15th century onward, symbolizing commitment, fidelity, and prestige. During the 20th century, especially during the Art Deco era and the post-war years, rings that combined rubies and diamonds gained popularity.

Renowned jewelry houses like Boucheron, Tiffany, and Chaumet created iconic models featuring these gems, setting trends that lasted decades. Today, vintage designs that unite rubies and diamonds continue to be highly sought-after for their beauty, fine materials, and strong symbolism. These rings are not only beautiful adornments but pieces of history, emotion, and refined style.
