Rubies, regarded as one of the most valuable gemstones, were particularly popular during the Victorian and Edwardian eras due to their symbolism of love, passion, and nobility. In ancient India, rubies were known as the "king of gems" and were reserved for royalty. The deep red hue, especially in Burmese rubies, has made this stone one of the most sought-after for centuries.During the 20th century, especially from the 1950s and 60s onward, coordinated jewelry sets including rings, earrings, necklaces, and bracelets became fashionable across Europe and the Americas. Prestigious houses such as Cartier and Van Cleef & Arpels frequently featured combinations of precious stones, particularly rubies with diamonds, sapphires, or emeralds.In the 1990s, jewelry design embraced a more refined and elegant aesthetic, featuring classic lines with echoes of Art Deco and Art Nouveau. Yellow gold regained popularity, and cabochon cuts became a favored trend for their smooth, polished appearance. These sets were ideal for both formal occasions and daily wear, especially among women who valued understated sophistication.Today, such pieces retain not only their aesthetic appeal but also increasing value in the collectors' market, as many were created using artisanal techniques that are now rare. Sets like this one are full of character and emotional depth, with strong potential as medium to long-term investments.
