Description

Guillaume Cabasson was a French painter, engraver, and art professor. At the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris, he was able to study under the sculptor Pierre-Jean David d'Angers, but especially under the painter Paul Delaroche, with whom he studied history painting. The latter made him his assistant and tasked him with restoring the stained-glass windows of several churches in Rouen, including Saint-Patrice, between 1840 and 1843. It was also in Rouen that he received his first distinction, a gold medal, for his painting The Captivity of Saint-Louis, at the exhibition of Norman arts and artists in 1840 in the same city. Delaroche, who worked on the paintings in the hemicycle of the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris until 1843, asked Cabasson to produce all the drawings to be used in the
