made available every year to three poor young men from Clusone who wanted to continue their studies in the liberal arts (Belotti, 1959). In Bologna he was supposedly a pupil of Marcantonio Franceschini: but the influences of the Bolognese painter's style cannot be perceived, while his return to his hometown is documented in 1687. The pictorial characteristics of his works are constituted by a diffuse luminosity and a chiaroscuro contrast in the figure-background relationship, while the application is modulated on sometimes diaphanous liquidity and the painting presented here stands out for its great expressive force and monumentality.
